would have been the first to insist that Holocaust historiography consider not only the perpetrators and the bystanders but also the silenced voices of the victims," Kassow writes. But he also wanted to record for posterity "that Jews were not just victims: they were people and part of a living and resilient nation."

Kassow brings us a story from the archive that reflects both the personal and collective concerns of the Oyneg Shabes project. As 19-year-old Nahum Gryzwacz helped to bury the first cache in the midst of a roundup, he added his own note: "I am running to my parents and see if they are all right. I don't know what's going to happen to me. Remember, my name is Nahum Gryzwacz [emphasis in original]." Even when facing their own likely deaths, Jews still believed that history matters and there would be future generations that would hear them.

I found this idea strangely uplifting because it means that there is still a role for us—to remember. The aunts I never knew, whose letters I inherited, will always be in my heart. □
