Stock of Abraham, who dwell in this land, continue to merit and enjoy the good will of the other inhabitants, while every one shall sit in safety under his own vine and fig tree, and there shall be none to make him afraid....”

Would you say that there was one overarching idea that animated the founding founders’ concept of religion?

I think the founders would say that the most important determinant of religious success is whether or not religion makes you a good person. And still today, for the most part, despite the fact that we have debates and lawsuits over what religious symbols are permissible in the public square, for the majority of Americans the test of one’s faith is determined by whether you treat your neighbors well, whether your prayers are heartfelt, and whether you lead a good life according to the dictates of your faith.

What do you wish the next president of the United States to understand about this balancing act between religion and state?

I would love it if the next president recognizes that someone’s view on separation of church and state does not necessarily describe his or her personal faith. Here in America we’ve come to think that if you support separation of church and state, you must be secular, and if you oppose separation of church and state, you must be religious—a very odd notion from the perspective of the founding fathers, who made no such distinction and would have viewed it as a non sequitur.

Also, I hope the next president understands that neither side in the culture wars can claim that the founding fathers are on “their side,” thus legitimizing their point of view. In fact, the founding fathers disagreed with each other, and if they were alive today, some of them would agree with the more conservative approach while others would align themselves with the more liberal approach. And if the founders themselves couldn’t agree on all this, then all of us should cut one another some slack and come to understand that these are complex issues with gray areas by design. □
