- 6. Add the mushrooms to the onions. Sauté for approximately 5–7 minutes until the mushrooms give up their juices and begin to look dry.
 - 7. Add the seasonings and the sherry.
- 8. Roll a ball of dough ¼-inch thick on a lightly floured surface and cut into approximately six 2-inch circles.
- 9. Place a teaspoon of mushroom sherry filling in the center of each circle. Dip your finger in water and brush the edges of each circle with it. Fold the circle in half. Pinch the edges together and use the tines of a fork to crimp them. Place on an ungreased cookie sheet.
- 10. Follow the same procedure with the rest of the dough.
- 11. Brush the egg yolk glaze onto the tops of the turnovers. Sprinkle with sesame seeds. Bake at 400°F for about 15 minutes, until light and golden. Serve hot. Yield: 2 dozen turnovers.

to live in two worlds—secular and religious—inevitably involves choices.

Set in 1968—at the height of the Vietnamese war and campus rebellions—this novel depicts the inner struggle of a young man who is deeply attached to his family, history, and religion, and at the same time committed to his search for self. Elisha is thrilled on occasions when his two worlds converge—as when he discovers that Franz Kafka was interested in Chassidism and had visited his rabbinic grandfather several times in Prague. But more often Elisha finds that he is changing in ways that separate him from the Chassidic community, putting him on a direct collision course with his father. Steering clear of sentimentality and with a keen eye for humor, Halberstam tells a quintessential story of youth intent on finding its own way, while the parental generation learns how to guide while letting go—in this case, through the wisdom of Chassidic tales.
